Evidence may be used directly or circumstantially. Usually, in a circumstantial evidence case, the jury is asked to infer guilt from a number of circumstances which, when taken as a whole, eliminate the hypothesis of innocence.

Commonly, three directions are given in substantially circumstantial cases:

1. A direction about drawing inferences: see Chapter 23 - General;
2. A direction that 'guilt should not only be a rational inference but should be the only rational inference that could be drawn from the circumstances' (see R v Perera [\[1986\] 1 Qd R 211](#), [217]; R v Owen \(1991\) 56 SASR 397, 406); and
3. A direction that if there is any reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence, the jury's duty is to acquit (see R v Holman [\[1997\] 1 Qd R 373](#), [380]).

The second and third directions above are different ways of conveying, or emphasising, the meaning of 'beyond reasonable doubt' (see R v Holman [\[1997\] 1 Qd R 373](#), [380]).

It is not in every circumstantial case that particular items of evidence need be proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt. See Dalton JA in R v Waters [\[2023\] QCA 243](#), in which her Honour said at [139] (quoting Shepherd v The Queen \(1990\) 170 CLR 573, [592-593]):

'If an inference of guilt is open on the evidence, the question for the jury is whether the inference has been proved beyond reasonable doubt – not whether any particular fact has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. ... Ordinarily, in a circumstantial evidence case, guilt is inferred from a number of circumstances – often numerous – which taken as a whole eliminate the hypothesis of innocence. The cogency of the inference of guilt is derived from the cumulative weight of circumstances, not the quality of proof of each circumstance'.

However, there will be cases where it is necessary to isolate and identify for the jury 'intermediate facts' constituting indispensable links in a chain of reasoning towards an inference of guilt; if so it may well be appropriate to tell the jury that such facts must be proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt.

Where the evidence consists of 'strands in a cable' rather than 'links in a chain', it will not be appropriate to give the direction just mentioned (see R v Jones [\[1993\] 1 Qd R 676](#), [680]; Shepherd v The Queen \(1990\) 170 CLR 573, [578]).

Where the case is not based entirely or substantially on circumstantial evidence, a modified direction in respect of circumstantial evidence may be appropriate when summing-up in respect of an element of the offence which is based entirely or substantially on circumstantial evidence.

48.3 Suggested direction

[Last reviewed: March 2025]

Circumstantial evidence is evidence of circumstances which can be relied upon not as proving a fact directly but instead as pointing to its existence. It differs from direct evidence, which tends to prove a fact directly: typically, when the witness testifies about something which that witness personally saw, or heard. Both direct and circumstantial evidence are to be considered.

(This paragraph may be added): It is not necessary that facts in dispute be proved by direct evidence. They may be proved by circumstantial evidence alone, by direct evidence alone, or by a combination of direct and circumstantial: that is, both direct and circumstantial evidence are acceptable proof of facts. So, you should consider all the evidence, including circumstantial evidence.

To bring in a verdict of guilty based entirely or substantially upon circumstantial evidence, it is necessary that guilt should not only be a rational inference but also that it should be the only rational inference that could be drawn from the circumstances.

If there is any reasonable possibility consistent with innocence, it is your duty to find the Defendant not guilty. This follows from the requirement that guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt.
